We all saw Elon Musk calling for the overthrowing of our government on Saturday. Now we get Trump arriving with all his tech puppeteers. A must read for anyone who cares about the future of Britain.

Trump arrives in the UK tomorrow with one clear objective: to sign what's being called a "groundbreaking" tech deal that will fundamentally reshape Britain's digital infrastructure.

The UK-US Tech Deal: Investment or Surrender? · 5 pages

Here's what we know so far: OpenAI and Nvidia are planning a multibillion-dollar investment in UK data centres, working with London-based Nscale Global Holdings. BlackRock is committing £500 million ($700 million) to British data centre infrastructure in partnership with Digital Gravity Partners. These aren't small side projects. Nscale alone has announced plans to invest $2.5 billion over three years, including sites that will house 45,000 high-end AI chips. Some of these commitments are tied directly to Trump's Stargate AI initiative, which aims to build $500 billion worth of AI infrastructure globally.

Here's why this matters: the most expensive and scarce AI resource isn't algorithms or even talent. It's compute capacity itself. Data centres packed with GPUs that cost millions and take years to build. If Nvidia, OpenAI, and Google end up controlling the UK's largest AI infrastructure, then British access becomes subject to their commercial terms and their government's policies. We're not buying neutral technology. We're buying into American regulatory frameworks, American political priorities, and American leverage points.

And look, this isn't about Trump personally. It's about what happens when you embed your critical digital infrastructure within another country's regulatory and political framework. The ownership of compute isn't neutral, and the dependency risk is frighteningly real.

The Trump administration has already shown us exactly how this works. They've mandated that AI systems developed with federal funding must strip out training data on critical race theory, diversity initiatives, and climate change. This is not content moderation at the user level. It's the foundational data that teaches these systems how to understand reality. They're rewriting truth at the source code of intelligence systems, and we're about to volunteer our infrastructure to operate under those same constraints.

But it goes further than AI training data. Rubio has already revoked visas and green cards from foreign nationals based purely on their criticism of Israel's actions in Gaza. A Turkish doctoral student lost her visa simply for writing an op-ed calling for divestment from Israeli-linked companies. Now Congress is considering legislation that would give Rubio the power to revoke US passports from American citizens on similar grounds. Think about what this means for British researchers, academics, or business leaders who depend on US-controlled infrastructure but hold views that contradict American foreign policy positions.

Intellectual loneliness isn't about wanting 'deep talks.' It's about realising how few people can tolerate complexity. It's noticing how quickly people rush to have an answer not to understand, but to feel right. It's watching people form entire worldviews off headlines, vibes, and whatever reels told them last. It's the silence that follows when you say something that doesn't fit neatly into someone's script. It's not arrogance. It's exhaustion, from always having to code-switch between what you actually think and what's safe to say around people who shut down at nuance. And no one warns you: Once your brain learns to stretch, small talk doesn't just bore you, it alienates you. You're not looking for smart people. You're looking for people who are still thinking.
